ABSTRACT

The concept of Body Image has been significant in the lives of human beings since times immemorial. It forms an integral part of our self identity and is difficult to elude. Therefore it produced a quest among the researchers to discover the ideas Buddhist nuns have about their body image, who prima facie are different from other females. The researchers therefore wanted to explore, whether the immense exposure in this modern world with various sources to enhance one's beauty affect this cult of Buddhist nuns. The aim of the present research study was to explore the internal representations Buddhist nuns have about their body image. A Purposive sample of four Buddhist nuns (25 – 40 years) was taken. The case study method was used under which free association, Twenty Statements Test (Kuhn and Portland, 1954) and semi – structured interviews were used. The thematic analysis of the data revealed various themes like satisfaction, dissatisfaction, surrender of the body self and defense mechanisms or transcendence. This reflected that the subjects had an overall satisfactory body image mainly due to the overpowering effect their religious practices have on them. Though in some instances they do depict dissatisfaction with their bodies but whether they handle that resentment on the basis of defense mechanism or their religious transcendent values still remains unanswered.

Keywords: body image, Buddhist nuns, case study, free association, Twenty statement test, semi structured interviews.

INTRODUCTION

Body Image

The term body image refers to how we perceive our body; in our minds or looking into the mirror, encompassing our sense of how others see us in terms of our physical appearance and the level of connection to our bodies. Paul Schilder (1886-1940), an Austrian psychoanalyst, was the first to coin the phrase Body image in his Book – The Image and Appearance of Human Body, published in the year 1935. Each one of us has a body image and is considered to be an integral part of our self identity and affects the quality of life. We cannot elude having a body image; it is a part of Human nature.

A Street Child's Perspective: A Grounded Theory Study of How Street Children Experience and Cope with Grief

Abstract

The research project entitled – "A Street Child's Perspective: A Grounded Theory Study of How Street Child Experience and Cope with Grief," seeks to understand and explain how street children experience and cope with grief. Grief is multi-faceted and highly subjective. However, most street children, sharing the same contexts and backgrounds show some commonality in their experiences and coping styles. The paper attempts to understand grief as it is subjectively experienced by street children. The research employed qualitative techniques – In-Depth Interviewing, Focus Group Discussions (FGDs) and field notes. The researcher contacted an NGO and through them, gained access to street shelters. The sample comprised of 18 street children - 9 boys; 9 girls, selected through purposive and snowball sampling. After the data was collected using the aforementioned methods, Constructivist Grounded Theory was subsequently used to analyze the data. The results emphasize how similar backgrounds – familial, educational, religious – and shared experiences have influenced expressions of grief and coping styles. Most street children come from broken families and are migrants; they lack enhanced level of literacy; and religion defines their existence – all these factors coalesce to shape their perspective on grief. Street children experience grief collectively, rather than as separate individuals. Their coping styles reflect underlying common patterns that help them connect with one another and experience grief together.
